Pragmatism wins vote of Singaporeans

The West Australian Wednesday January 8, 1997

The Issues

The re-election of the People's Action Party, which has been in power since 1959, is a victory for pragmatism. On the political scene, the party's leader, Chuan Leekpai, has been praised for his handling of the country's finances and for his economic policies. The party's success is also seen as a rejection of the opposition's radical ideas.

In the economic sphere, the People's Action Party has been praised for its pro-business stance and its focus on attracting foreign investment. The party has also been praised for its policies on education and healthcare, which have been seen as improving the standard of living for Singaporeans.

The party's success is also seen as a rejection of the opposition's radical ideas, which have been seen as too extreme for the country's needs. The People's Action Party has been praised for its focus on stability and progress, rather than radical change.

The party's success is also seen as a rejection of the opposition's radical ideas, which have been seen as too extreme for the country's needs. The People's Action Party has been praised for its focus on stability and progress, rather than radical change.

The party's success is also seen as a rejection of the opposition's radical ideas, which have been seen as too extreme for the country's needs. The People's Action Party has been praised for its focus on stability and progress, rather than radical change.

The party's success is also seen as a rejection of the opposition's radical ideas, which have been seen as too extreme for the country's needs. The People's Action Party has been praised for its focus on stability and progress, rather than radical change.

The party's success is also seen as a rejection of the opposition's radical ideas, which have been seen as too extreme for the country's needs. The People's Action Party has been praised for its focus on stability and progress, rather than radical change.